ABOUT THE DITIDAHT FIRST NATION

Ditidaht's unceded traditional territory is quite large. It stretches inland past Lake Cowichan and outlines Nitinaht Lake itself, including lands beyond the lake, and it extends to the coast, between Bonilla Point and Pachena Point. Ditidaht traditional territories also include important resources, such as underground water stores known as aquifers, tributary rivers and steams, and significant ocean ranges that are utilized to provide the nation with halibut, cod and various salmon species. Ditidaht has a registered member population of 775 members, with 250 people living in the local community of Balaats'adt, more commonly known as Nitinaht Lake, B.C.

Current Ditidaht membership is comprised of at least 10 small villages that were along the coast within Ditidaht traditional territory. Significant villages or regions typically had a hereditary chief and traditional governance system, which was in place until colonialism reached the west coast. Ditidaht people speak a distinct dialect, closely related to neighbouring Nuu-Chah-Nulth nations.
